

WEDNESDAY, June 22th, 2022 – 5 AM WEATHER FORECAST

A few additional raindrops fell in the evening before cloud cover began to thin out overnight dropping out temperatures to just below 60 degrees to start Wednesday. A surface low pressure resting just south of western Long Island will have our surface winds remaining from the SE today and tomorrow as it slowly drifts SW into the Chesapeake late this afternoon. This setup has allowed a stationary front to remain draped across the region today through Thursday morning allowing for High Pressure to slowly fill behind the low this afternoon through the weekend. The surface boundary developing along the region just to our east over the last 8 hours will start to move south and west this afternoon, combining with the mid - level flow from the SE, with showers and storms expected to develop along this frontal boundary as it makes its way into central PA early this evening. The forming areas of convection will move eastward across the SE portion of the PA tonight into THU morning allowing for potentially heavy rainfall to occur, primarily concentrated to our south with precipitation totals across our area continue to show 0.25 - 0.75".
