

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 2026 – 2 PM WEATHER FORECAST

A few scattered showers will hang around through this afternoon, and while the odds are very low, we can't completely rule out a rumble of thunder if a few breaks in the clouds allow the atmosphere to become a little more unstable. Shower activity will gradually fade by early this evening as the system moves away, and winds will shift from south and southwest to northerly while gradually weakening, although a few gusts near 20 MPH are still possible this afternoon. High pressure builds in tonight, setting us up for a mostly dry and pleasant weekend that should continue into early next week. A few areas of fog will develop before burning off by mid-morning Saturday. Temperatures remain below average over the next several days, with afternoon highs generally in the upper 60s to lower 70s and overnight lows dropping into the upper 40s and lower 50s. A weak disturbance could bring a few light showers back to western Oregon Tuesday and into Wednesday morning, but high pressure quickly rebuilds Wednesday afternoon.
